Automobiles have become highly complex in recent years. The function and role of the advanced electronic systems that control every aspect of the car have increased substantially.

Post the Volkswagen emission scandal, regulatory agencies around the world have become very strict and this will be a major driver for the engine management systems market. Also, customers in the markets of India and China are becoming more aware of enhancing the performance of their vehicles and this will boost the market as well.

Asia-Pacific is the largest automobile market in the world but it is not expected to have the highest market share in the segment on account of the relatively lower electronic automation of vehicles sold in the region. The average segment of vehicles sold in the region is lower than that of the markets of North American and Europe. North America is the largest automotive engine management systems market in the world. There exists a trend of automotive customization in the region that has propelled the engine management systems market significantly. However, due to the fast growing automotive sales, especially in the markets of China and India, the Asia-Pacific market for engine management systems are anticipated to experience the fastest growth by 2020.

Engine management systems for passenger cars are expected to see the maximum rate of growth in the forecast period. This could be as a result of the growing popularity for mid-level sedans and hatchbacks in the region. South America, on account of stagnant sales in the forecast period, primarily in Brazil, is forecasted to be the slowest growing market over the coming 5 years. The African market is likely to emerge as a strong player post -2020, as the automobile market is expected to reach critical mass in the region by then.

The market has been segmented by vehicle type (passenger vehicles, commercial vehicles), engine type (gasoline, diesel, others) and geography (North America, South America, Europe, Middle East & Africa and Asia-Pacific).

Some of the key players in the market are:

Bosch

Continental

Delphi

Denso

Hella
