WEST PALM BEACH, FL, UNITED STATES, July 5, 2017 /

EINPresswire.com/ -- The island of Haiti is the third largest country by land in the Caribbean with approximately 27,750 square kilometers in size after Cuba and the Dominican Republic. Haiti is also the most mountainous country in the Caribbean with its name meaning 'land of the mountains' in the indigenous Taino language. With all the positive energy that this great nation has, it still continues to recover after two devastating natural disasters in the last seven years. Much of Haiti's economic and physical infrastructure was destroyed by a 2010 earthquake, causing an estimated $8 billion in losses, according to the World Bank. Then in 2016, the country was hit by Hurricane Matthew, which caused an estimated $1.9 billion in damage and losses.

According to a fact sheet from the U.S. Department of State, "Much progress has been made in the seven years after the January 2010 earthquake that devastated much of the country. Haiti has transitioned from a post-disaster era to a period of reconstruction and long-term development." Following those disasters, governments and aid organizations around the world have contributed resources in rebuilding and recovery. These resources are being utilized to build roads, bridges, education, agriculture and job creation to name a few initiatives.
