states, "I was staring at the canvas one day, at it just kind of struck me. I had been painting people for a while and I found having a live subject quite inspiring. One day I thought I'd play around with the idea of painting a face, and it just kind of took off from there!"

She first studied makeup at the Illamasqua School of Makeup Art. "I got to learn so many creative techniques and had such great mentoring from the teachers there," she states. "After I took some of their classes, I went on to the prestigious London College of Fashion and achieved the University Degree in Hair and Makeup for Film and T.V," she adds, "It was a blast!" She states that it was here that she learned wig making, special effects, understanding characters and story, prosthetics, period makeup, and hair, and much more.

Omayma admits that not any amount of training can prepare a person as much as experience does. She reveals, "The training definitely put me at an advantage over those who had not received formal training, however--boy did I graduate with a lot to learn!" She adds, "Having on-set experience really is what built me as an artist. The more you work with new people and experience their visions and ideas, and contribute your ideas too--the better!"

When asked what the best part of her job is, Omayma Ramzy admits, "I would say the best part of being a Makeup Artist is collaborating with a team to create art. I love how we all have our own take on a particular vision, and get to bounce off of each other to create something better than any of us had initially thought of. It's a case of several parts making the bigger whole--And I love it!"
